This article provides a scientific analysis of ensuring youth participation and its prospects in developing effective public administration in the context of the New Uzbekistan. It also highlights that one of the priority tasks in building the New Uzbekistan is the modernization of the public administration system, ensuring its transparency and efficiency.

Keywords: New Uzbekistan, public administration, youth policy, civil society, efficiency, human resource potential.

Currently, the present stage of the development of statehood in the New Uzbekistan prioritizes improving the efficiency of public administration and modernizing it in accordance with contemporary socio-political requirements. In particular, in the context of growing global competition and technological progress, state institutions are expected to operate effectively, promptly, and transparently. In this regard, ensuring youth participation in the process of modernizing and developing the public administration system during the construction of the New Uzbekistan is becoming one of the key priorities.

The active involvement of young people in this process is of particular importance. Youth represent the most dynamic, innovative, and adaptive segment of society, serving as a critical human capital in the development of public administration. Indeed, in the current context of globalization and digitalization, the modernization of state administration systems is a crucial factor in the progress of any country. As the layer of society embodying intellectual and innovative potential, youth participation in public administration helps ensure the sustainability and continuity of reforms.

As emphasized by the President of the Republic of Uzbekistan, Shavkat Mirziyoyev, “It is impossible to build the New Uzbekistan without reforming the system of public administration.” Since 2017, Uzbekistan has been implementing administrative reforms, introducing digital governance, establishing systems for open dialogue with citizens, and consistently taking measures to ensure youth participation in the development of effective public administration.

The Strategy of Development of Uzbekistan establishes youth participation as a foundational factor for the country’s future progress in enhancing the efficiency and development of public administration. The vectors of reforms outlined in strategic documents include strengthening the functional capacity of political institutions, democratizing management processes, and modernizing through technological transformation. In this process, political institutions act not only as bodies ensuring normative and legal compliance but also as proactive agents of innovative governance.

Institutional coordination, technological adaptability, and ideological stability emerge as the three main pillars shaping Uzbekistan’s long-term development model. Therefore, ensuring youth participation in achieving an effective governance system is closely linked with harmonizing the country’s political system with global governance standards while preserving national identity and political sovereignty.

In the New Uzbekistan, the process of developing effective public administration is closely linked with a thorough analysis and consistent improvement of the normative and legal foundations of social policy. The ongoing reforms in this area are based on the country's socio-economic development strategy, mechanisms for ensuring citizens' constitutional rights, and the concept of modernizing state governance institutions.

The effectiveness of public administration depends, on the one hand, on the functional coordination of institutional and legal mechanisms, and on the other hand, on the ability to implement clearly defined goals and objectives in a timely manner through the normative and legal framework of social policy. In recent years, laws adopted in Uzbekistan, presidential decrees, government resolutions, and strategic programs have introduced new approaches to legal regulation in the social sphere. These measures take into account the interests of various segments of the population and contribute to the formation of effective management mechanisms in social protection, employment, education, healthcare, and other sectors.

In today's conditions of globalization and innovative development, the efficiency of the state administration system is one of the key factors determining the level of socio-economic development of the country. During the construction of the New Uzbekistan, reforming public administration and transforming it into a system that is open, transparent, and serves the interests of the people has become an increasingly urgent task.

Currently, ensuring youth participation in public administration is of particular importance as one of the key indicators of a democratic society. Engaging young people in decision-making serves several critical purposes, including ensuring transparency and openness in state governance, strengthening public oversight, enhancing the social effectiveness of state decisions, and developing a reserve of promising managerial personnel.

In recent years, systematic reforms aimed at involving youth in public administration within the framework of the New Uzbekistan have been implemented. Several mechanisms play a crucial role in this process. These include the establishment of youth councils and civic structures under state bodies, open competitions and internship programs for young specialists, mechanisms for collecting youth proposals through electronic government services and digital platforms, and focused training of public administration specialists in higher education institutions. These mechanisms ensure the practical involvement of youth in governance and contribute to improving the quality of administrative decisions.

In conclusion, ensuring youth participation in shaping effective public administration in the New Uzbekistan is of strategic importance. The intellectual potential, innovative ideas, and active civic engagement of young people create a foundation for improving the public administration system. This, in turn, lays a solid basis for establishing the strategic foundations of national development through the advancement of efficient and effective governance.
